

Chrysler Employees Help Reduce Turkey Day Hunger

by Jim Stickford

While the state of the auto industry has improved over the past couple of years, times are still tough for a lot of people in southeastern Michigan.

That's why Chrysler employees have volunteered to get involved in collecting food for those in need.

Daphne Harris, Civic Relations and Community Engagement manager at Chrysler, said the company collected about 12,000 pounds of food from its employees over the first couple of weeks in November.

The food was then delivered by Chrysler volunteers to the Gleaners Food Bank in Detroit, Lighthouse in Oakland County and the Hope Center in Macomb County.

"We had about 60 volunteers from the company help us deliver the food," Harris said.

"And to get it ready for delivery, about 40 volunteers helped me package the donated food so that it could be delivered. A total of about 100 people volunteered their time."

Also on hand to observe the unloading of the food donated by Chrysler employees was Walt Young, board chairman of the Gleaners Food Bank.

"We service five counties - Wayne, Oakland, Macomb, Monroe and Livingston - from our facility in Detroit," Young said.

"We provide about 100,000 meals a day through 563 partner agencies such as the Salvation Army.

"At this time of year, the efforts of the people from companies like Chrysler really go a long way toward making Thanksgiving a 'hunger-free' zone.

"There have been a lot of cut-backs in government programs so community organizations like us (Gleaners) are trying to fill the gap.

"Chrysler helping the community really helps everybody. It's a true win-win for these volunteer employees and our clients."
